RE: 2026-H 7584, An Act Relating to Criminal Procedure – Criminal Injuries Compensation

Chair Abney:

I write in strong support of 2026-H 7584, which would help re-establish a secure funding source for the Crime Victim Compensation Program (“CVCP” or the “Program”) and reduce Program reliance on annual budget appropriation. To do so, it would add a $1.00 surcharge on all civil and criminal traffic violations in Rhode Island. This would include offenses like speeding tickets, red light cameras, failure to signal, texting while driving, and headlight or taillight infractions. It would not include parking violations. This surcharge would be in addition to the current ticket amount, so this legislation would not re-allocate revenue. Rather, it creates a new funding stream to directly benefit innocent victims of crime.

Administered by the Office of the General Treasurer, the CVCP provides direct cash assistance to Rhode Islanders that have been the victim of a violent crime. Program funds can be used to cover funeral expenses, physical relocation, crime scene clean-up, pecuniary losses to dependents of a deceased victim (such as lost wages), and/or expenses incurred as a result of physical injury or death (such as medical bills or mental health treatment). Over the past four years, the CVCP has helped over 1,300 individuals and impacted thousands across our state.

Traditionally, the CVCP is funded by grants under the federal Victims of Crime Act (the “VOCA”) and from in-state court fines and fees, criminal restitution, court orders on any criminal charged with a felony, misdemeanor, or petty misdemeanor in Rhode Island, and general revenue. See R.I. Gen. Laws § 12-25-28. Through the VOCA, the federal government provides a 75% match of all expenditures made by the state in the preceding fiscal year.

But over the past decade, resources for this crucial lifeline have steadily declined. Specifically, program funds generated by court fines and fees have decreased by over $1.2 million since 2010.¹ As a result, there has been a corresponding decrease in federal funding and, inevitably, program expenditures. This funding shortfall is an unintended consequence of well-needed reforms to the criminal justice system. Legislation like the Justice Reinvestment Act – for example – lowered criminal penalties and resulted in fewer offenders receiving judicial punishment, both of which have the secondary effect of reducing fines and fees coming into the program.

Since 2010, CVCP funding from court fines and fees has undergone a dramatic decline, necessitating increased reliance on general revenue to fund victim support efforts.

This is a significant loss both to the victims and to the state. Not only are victims receiving less, but the state is not realizing the full benefit of available federal resources. The decline in state funding underscores the need to re-establish a reliable funding mechanism that will supplement court fines and fees and help the state provide meaningful financial assistance to crime victims and their families. This legislative change is intended to both close that funding gap and maximize federal funding.

Funding challenges are further exasperated by funding cuts to certain VOCA and Department of Justice grant programs. Though these cuts do not directly affect the CVCP, they have had a ripple effect across many public and private organizations that provide victim support services. As a result, Treasury can reasonably expect an increase in the number of applicants seeking and qualifying for support through the CVCP.

At least 13 other states partially fund their Crime Victim Compensation Program through a charge on traffic violations. Those states have maintained steady funding levels without reliance on annual appropriations from the respective legislative bodies.

¹ For context, the Governor’s Fiscal Year 2027 Recommended Budget proposes $1,649,346 in total funding to the CVCP. The overall CVCP budget has declined significantly over the last 15 years. The FY2011 revised budget appropriated $2,444,147 for program expenditures.

I urge this Committee to recommend passage and help Treasury support innocent victims of crime from North Providence to Newport. If you have any further questions, please do not hesitate to reach out to me directly or to my Director of Policy and Intergovernmental Affairs, Robert Craven, Jr., at Robert.CravenJr@treasury.ri.gov.
