I am a little confused as to why a bill is being voted on that targets just Providence public school teachers. Not only does this seem unfair to educators in the city, but also mean-spirited as well. If this bill is worthwhile, why is it not being brought forth at a statewide level? Can someone please explain this to me? Will stripping away rights from only Providence teachers help attract better educators to the city? Will more people line up for the district if they know what low regard certain elected leaders in Providence and the state have for them? How will any of this benefit the students? Has anyone thought this out, or is it just a way to break the Providence Teachers Union contract, which was the implicit goal the state takeover failed to achieve? As a Providence resident, I cannot support any politician who thinks so lowly of the Providence School District, its students and educators.

Sincerely,

Jonathan Benchsky
